To some extent, it is natural for immigrant (and ethnic minority) entrepreneurs to internationalize business efforts. Language knowledge can also help with internationalization decisions in their home country or other same-language speaking countries (Sui et al., 2015). Having experiences in two contexts makes establishing links between a host and a home country a desirable and popular means of business development.

Ethnic entrepreneurship is by no means a new phenomenon, as it is a firm part of any migration, most obviously observed in the United States, where the foreign born have been overrepresented in small businesses since 1880 (Barret et al., 1996). The long history of ethnic entrepreneurship in the USA also explains why research in this subject has its

3 Ethnic entrepreneurship: a theoretical framework

The main study focuses on ethnic minority immigrant entrepreneurs, a group that is relatively neglected in the family business literature despite the fact that immigrants from ethnic minority, especially Asian, communities tend to have strong family ties and family involvement in business (Basu, 2004).
