But now Rhys has outdone herself—The Tuscan Child is a poignant story of love in wartime, woven into a compelling search for the truth when mysteries consigned to the past begin to unravel. The Tuscan Child presented me with a conundrum—didn't want the book to end, yet I couldn't put it down. Best read with a glass of Chianti beside a roaring fire.

The Tuscan Child. Written by Rhys Bowen. Review by Linda Harris Sittig. Set against the backdrop of the Tuscan hills of Italy, this story is told through dual narrators. One is Hugo Langley, a British bomber shot down in 1944 into a German-occupied area of Italy. The other narrator is Joanna Langley, his modern-day estranged daughter who discovers, after his death, an unopened letter addressed thirty years ago to a woman in Tuscany—a woman that Joanna knows nothing about.

This is the story of how Joanna Langley discovered the secrets of her father, Hugo Langley after he passed away in 1973. Hugo has been a British Airman in the second war, who in December of 1944, bailed out over Italy and with some important help from a village girl, hid himself from the Germans until he recovered from his wounds.
